with increased fury, and created further damage.

The barque left Glasgow on the 3rd May, and from the time of leaving the Channel until Sunday last, when she sighted what is considered to be the Solitaries, land had not been sighted.

The passage had taken 121 days, and as a fair indication of the weather she experienced, it may be mentioned that she encountered no less than four heavy gales in one week. On one occasion the sea washed away two of the boats, the iron deck-house was stove in, and one of the seamen Westhall had his ribs broken.

On Sunday last, although the weather was very misty, the captain managed to take observations, and estimated that his vessel was thirty-five miles off the land. A northerly course was then shaped. On Sunday evening the barque was hove to, and a man was sent aloft to the top gallant yard to keep a lookout for the land.

At 4:45a.m. on Monday, the weather being very dirty and it being almost impossible to see for any distance, the mate called the captain and told him that in his opinion they were near the breakers. The Captain had barely time to come on deck before the vessel struck. The captain stated that on reaching the shore he was totally unconscious and did not regain his senses till early the following morning.

THE BRISBANE COURIER, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1894

Almost in sight of port, after voyaging half-way round the world, the barque Cambus-wallace has become a total wreck, involving the loss of six lives.

Early on Monday morning, in the darkness and rain, miles out of her course, and staggering under the heavy South-East squalls, the vessel went ashore on Stradbroke Island, and within twelve hours practically went to pieces.

The place where the ill-fated vessel struck, 200 yards from the beach, is one in which, especially with a North-East or South-East wind blowing, it would be impossible for the strongest vessel long to hold together, and the force of the breakers on this occasion was such that only the bowsprit, a portion of the stern, and a few broken timbers were to be seen yesterday afternoon.

JAPANESE WHISKY

The Japanese started making whisky commercially in the 1920s when Shinjiro Torii opened the Yamazaki distillery with Masataka Taketsuru. Together they created Suntory Whisky. Taketsuru later went on to open his own distillery in Yoichi which would become Nikka Whisky. Nikka tend to produce whiskies in the Scottish style, whereas Suntory create whiskies for the Japanese palate.
